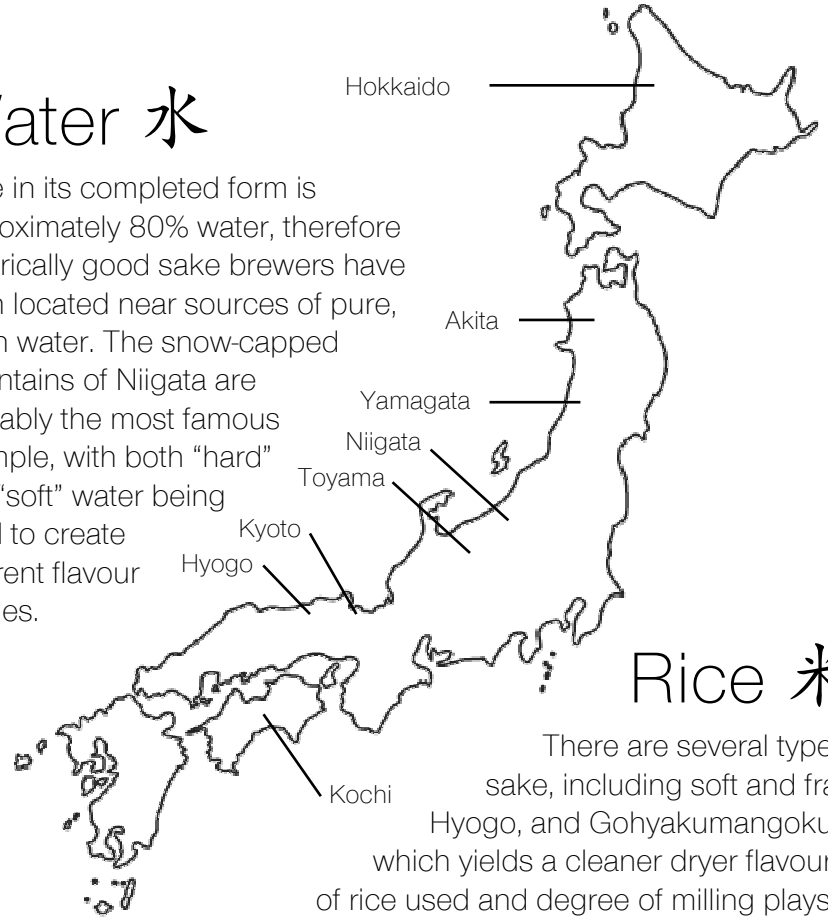
Sake of Japan



Water 水

Sake in its completed form is approximately 80% water, therefore historically good sake brewers have been located near sources of pure, clean water. The snow-capped mountains of Niigata are probably the most famous example, with both “hard” and “soft” water being used to create different flavour profiles.

日本酒

Rice 米

There are several types of rice used to produce sake, including soft and fragrant Yamada Nishiki from Hyogo, and Gohyakumangoku from Toyama and Niigata which yields a cleaner dryer flavour profile. The combination of rice used and degree of milling plays a vital role in the quality of the final product.

Sake Tasting Set

A pre-selected set of 3 glasses of sake ranging across different styles and grades for you to taste, savor and compare.

焼酎 Shochu

Shochu is a Japanese spirit produced using a distillation process similar to vodka. Shochu is made using various ingredients such as rice, wheat, sweet potato, sugar and buckwheat to name a few. There are various methods of production including single distillation in which the Shochu retains the taste and characteristics of it's base ingredient, and multiple distillation which creates a relatively lighter and more delicate style. With a typical alcohol content of 25%, Shochu is smoother and easier to drink than many other spirits. Traditionally served straight up, on the rocks, with hot or cold water or as Chu-Hai - a mixture of soda water and juice.
